

Practice Transition Accreditation Program™ Update

AUGUST 2017

Message from the PTAP™ Office

Connecting Your Program Goals To Outcomes

The Practice Transition Accreditation Program (PTAP)™ criteria require that organizations identify goals (Program Overview 5) and outcome measures of the program (Program Overviews 21 & 22). Many times, organizations identify broad goals that do not have a direct correlation to outcome measures. When program goals are too broad, it becomes difficult to assess whether the goal is being met by the program curriculum and practice-based learning experiences.

As programs grow and evolve, it is important to reflect on the current program's goals and outcome measures. Some questions to ask include:

1. Do the program goals reflect the current state of the program?
2. Does the program have too many goals or outcome measures?
3. Are the program goals specific, measureable, realistic, and attainable?
4. Are the outcome measures correlated to the program goals?

5. Do the current goals and outcome measures provide insight to the program leadership on how successful the program is in meeting the learners' needs?

A helpful structure when writing program goals is the SMART format. When goals are specific, measurable, attainable, realistic, and time-bound, the program can easily pair outcome measures with the goal. Here are some examples of program goals and outcomes that correlate:

Goal:

- The program will increase retention rates by 10% over the next year compared to 2017 data.
 - Current year retention rate (2017): 80%
 - Goal retention rate (2018): 90%

Outcome Measure:

- Retention rates of residents/fellows over the next year compared to previous year's retention rate.

Tool:

- Retention data.

Goal:

- Increase the confidence of the resident/fellow throughout the program by 20% by the end of the experience.

Outcome Measure:

- Post-data on confidence score/pre-data on confidence score.

Tool:

- Confidence tool.

Program Directors, I encourage you to reflect on your current program's goals and outcome measures to see if they are SMART. As your program prepares for accreditation, it is important to measure the success of the program through meaningful outcomes and goals.

“Practicing the narrative style of documentation in groups was really helpful in preparation to start writing our self-study.”

“Discussing in-depth topics such as competencies with other groups who run transition programs gave us new ideas to apply to our own program.”

Getting Ready to Write a PTAP™ Self-Study

When PTAP appraisers begin a self-study review, their first introduction to the applicant program is PO1, in which the applicant provides an executive summary of their program. As the appraisers' first impression of the applicant, the executive summary should set the stage for the environment in which the transition program plays out.

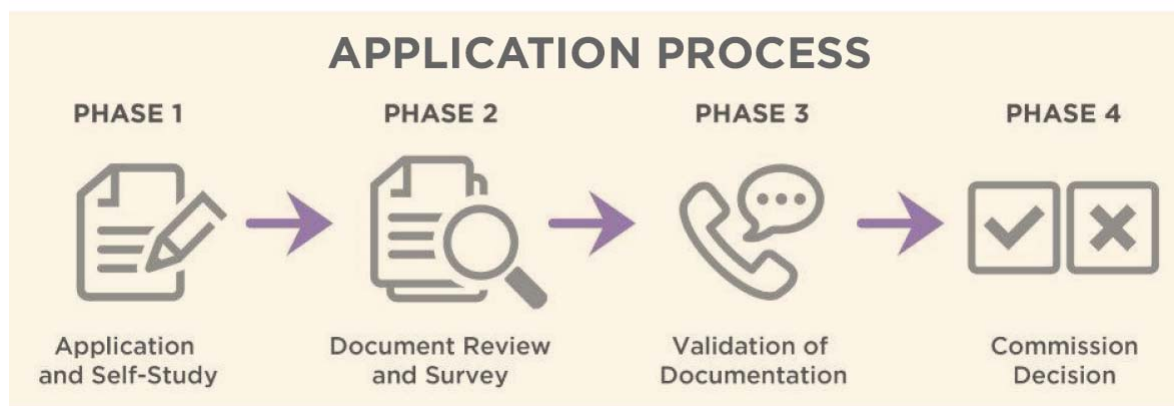

Following are some important components you should be sure to include in your program's executive summary:

- A description of the organization/practice setting:
- Is the program operationalized in a large academic teaching hospital, in a rural critical access facility, in a long-term care facility, or across a home health network? Tell us where you are and who is involved, including the patient population and the participants' scope of practice.
- How long is the program? RN residencies must be a minimum of six months, but some programs are longer. RN and APRN fellowships are not defined by a minimum time frame, so make it clear when the program begins and ends. Be sure to include whether precepted time lasts for the entire program or if it is only during an initial intensive period. What kind of support is given after that precepted time?
- Scope of the program: Do you incorporate the organization's orientation into your transition program, or is it treated as separate?

- How many residents/fellows are accepted into the program with each cohort? This may vary based on need and availability. How does the program forecast each cohort and plan for variations in cohort size?

The executive summary will not tell the appraisers everything there is to know about your transition program, but it will allow them to approach their review with the appropriate context in which to place your evidence.
